COMPARE	- Addresses user age and age-specific agreements + parental consent - Contact info for any concerns is easily accessible (at bottom) - Contact methods don't seem easily accessible/consumer-friendly - Vague about what info is "need-to-know" - Covers what data is retained and how it's processed or stored - Both share data with 3rd parties - Both claim the right to update and change policy, putting responsilibty of user to stay updated to changes by looking for date of last update
CONTRAST	- date that it was updated is very easily seen and accessible - Significantly longer 15 sections, most lengthy - Many subsections each - More specific about security practices are protecting user data - More data is stored - Explains terms on international level	- Doesn't list when it was updated; has to be accessed through links and some digging - Significantly shorter 4 brief sections 2 subsections - General statement that user data is being protected and privacy respected - Doesn't readily mention possible international usage or accessibility of user data

OVERVIEW:

I would definitely use both. Both are extremely useful to my profession and practice (and mandated, to an extent!). My awareness of legal constraints and protections of user info involved in the learning platform site gives me confidence that the law favors the user in most, if not all, circumstances. The other site, slack, spells things out with such specificity that if I am concerned about the usage of certain information that i volunteer or communication that i knowingly participate in on their site, I can understand what the repercussions are before I volunteer that data.
